I have an obsession with knits that only use a small amount of yarn. I am also often stumped about what to do with beautifully hand dyed yarn. This open card covers both with a little sass. The pattern includes directions on making the cardigan close in the front.

Details: Oppositional is knit using 2 different weights of Dragonfly yarn Pixie and Traveller to create a colorblock effect that is popular right now. The cardigan is light and drapes in the shoulders and skirt and for the waist and trim it has a more substantial feel. The skirt has a slight Aline shape that is flattering on many body types. This pattern is suitable for a beginner who wants to add to their skill set but also an experienced knitter who enjoys a little intrigue without too much fuss.

The name Oppositional comes from the textures that go against the grain. Most of the body is knit in twisted stockinette, the remainder is knit in

I read somewhere recently that if a pattern has a short row heel then you can knit it cuff down or toe up. Is that generally true? I have saved a lot of sock patterns (among others kinds) and I would like to weed my favorites sock bundle down in size to what I can make without a lot of re-engineering..

Yes. If you want to pare down your sock patterns and are not intimidated by plugging in stitch patterns into an existing basic pattern, you might want to take a look at these sock recipes for toe-up and top-down:

<https://knitv.com/ISSUesummer06/PATUniversalsock.html>

<https://knitv.com/ISSUespring05/FEATsocks101.html>

and you can always work an after thought heel which is worked after the sock is finished. Short row heels are basically worked the same as short row toes.

<https://www.interweave.com/article/knitting/afterthought-...>

If you want to work a decorative stitch pattern, you might be able to adjust the number of stockinette, purl stitches or even add another tiny stitch pattern between stitch repeats so they fit your number of stitches.

That's true of socks with other heel styles, too. I know you can knit a standard flap and gusset heel in either

That's true of socks with other heel styles, too. I know you can knit a standard flap and gusset heel in either direction. I don't know about other, more rustic or regional heels, but I'd bet it can be done.

Any heel style can be knit toe up or cuff down. Sometimes the stitch pattern will limit things though. I'm thinking particularly about colorwork patterns like Elephants in Stripes where the shape of the stitches will change if you knit the chart from the other direction.

I agree that that's true, although the rest of the sock may not come out the same if it uses a pattern stitch like lace or cables. But the good news is you can work your preferred style of heel on any sock pattern. I like short-row heels and don't like the gusset and flap style so I usually do short rows no matter what the pattern says.

(I'm not sure this will help you weed out your collection though...)

Observations

- White space: Whether there is more or not depends on what you mean
 - Total unused space on either side of the main content area is mostly the same. In some cases, New Rav is slightly narrower, but in others it's noticeably wider. However, New Rav is more centered on the screen, particularly in the forums.
 - Pale header & more spacing around elements within the content area increases overall amount of white on the page as well as the space it takes to convey the same amount of information.
- Scrolling: So yes, both "New Rav" options do require more scrolling
 - This is because of the increased spacing around various elements as well as greater space between lines of text
 - Impact on pattern browsing, stash pages, and similar pages is less once you get past the initial headers
 - Amount of text per line can be increased by changing to Helvetica or Sans Serif in settings.
 - This won't drastically change the posts per visible screen except where long posts are written
- Drop Shadows: They are used differently in Old and New Rav.
 - Old Rav has them around patterns & stash entries. New Rav uses them on buttons, and they are sharper and darker.
 - These are removed entirely in New Rav - Herdwick.
- Outlines: Many people are still complaining about the outlines in New Rav
 - Forum post outlines are very similar. On the boards the Old Rav are nearly invisible, and are stronger in the New Rav.
 - Where Old Rav was using drop shadows to create an outline (on ½ of the image anyways), New Rav relies on a darker outline
 - Basically, this is a pretty mixed bag depending on where you are in Ravelry.
